

The canyon can be seen just to the right of Black Point; as we were hiking towards the sun it was difficult to sight on the canyon:

As we entered the canyon and headed up the wash, we saw that the terrain is very similar to that in the other areas near Black Point; low hills and wide canyon wash which later enter some narrows:

Nearing where the canyon cuts into Tucki Mountain, the canyon appears to end; however it cuts through some narrows:

The next five photos give an idea of these interesting narrows:

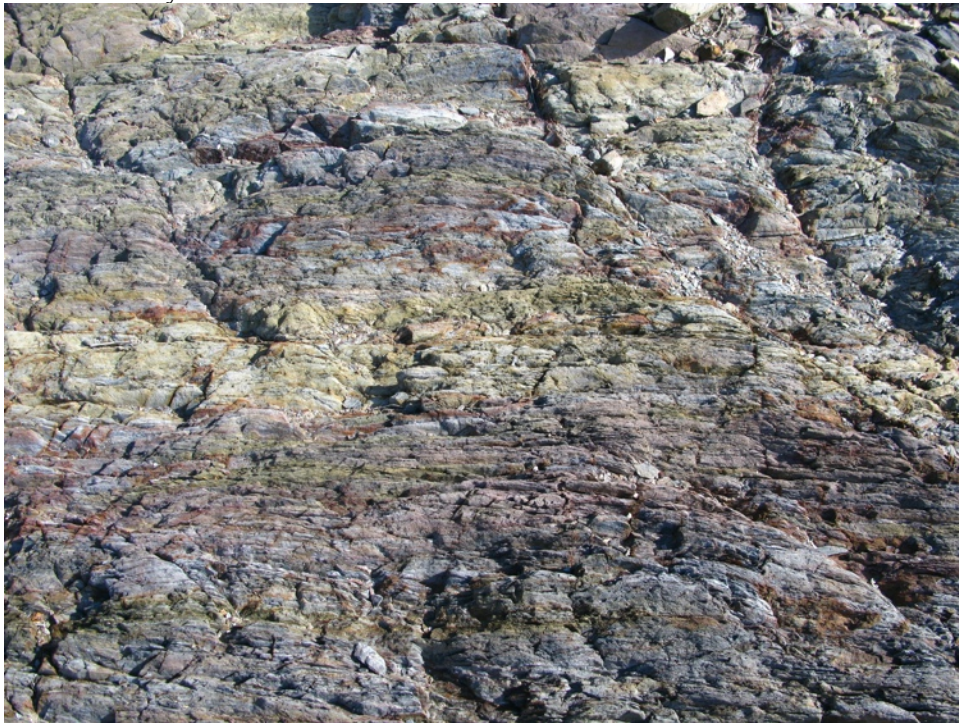

Interesting colored rock in the canyon:

Up ahead the canyon cuts into another narrow stretch:

A bighorn horn we found in this narrow stretch:

This is the first somewhat major impasse in the canyon which must be bypassed; before this there had only been a few small easy dryfalls:

Just a few more corners past this impasse, we encountered a rockfall and then a more major impasse; this impasse appeared to be difficult to bypass, and as the canyon was getting steeper at this point we decided to turn around:
